Creating Hope Together: ScotGov suicide prevention strategy 2022-2032

From Rev Denise Herbert, Diocesan Safeguarding Officer: Suicide in Scotland is a significant public health issue which affects all age groups and communities. Although no-one is immune from suicide, some individuals are at greater risk. Data from the Scottish Suicide Information Database (ScotSID) report, profiling suicide deaths between 2011 and 2019 shows: Just under three quarters of all suicides in Scotland are male. Almost half (46%) were aged 35-54. Death by suicide is approximately three times more likely among those living in the most socio-economically deprived areas than among those living in the least deprived area. 88% of people that die by suicide are of working age with two-thirds of these in employment at the time of their death.

We often hear about mental health issues, especially amongst young people, but any one of us could be at risk at any time, of feeling despair and hopelessness and whilst we hope our faith will support us it is one safeguarding issue that maybe we don’t think about but if we come across someone who seems to be despairing or withdrawn perhaps we need to stop and wonder if help is needed. Just passing on the thought to someone who might have more knowledge is a lot better than not saying anything though sadly, quite often, the person who is thinking of taking their own life does not say so and the family have no idea that the person has it in mind.
