We vote on June 8th

As the General Election on the 8th June coincides with General Synod in Edinburgh, many members will opt for a postal vote. I am fascinated how reports on elections are presented.

Margaret Thatcher's landslide victory in 1983 was achieved on 42.4% of the vote, but this will probably be lower than the SNP will get even on a poor showing. The SNP are unlikely to maintain 56 seats, as the Scottish Conservatives and Liberal Democrats will probably increase their number from one seat each. Though it is hard to predict how much 'tactical voting' might affect the result, it is difficult to see how the Conservatives will not win a larger majority in the Westminster Parliament than the 12 they had in the 2015 election on a 36.9% share of the vote. This will be reported as a major success for the Conservatives and be interpreted as a firm No to Scottish independence and a definite Yes to a hard Brexit for the UK. Any SNP losses will be seen, at least in England, as beginning to roll back nationalism. No one, except the SNP that is, will remark that they will hold the vast majority of Scottish seats. So both the Conservatives and the SNP will claim victory and that both have a mandate and both will be correct. This will continue to move Scotland, with its more social outlook, apart from England, which is more individualistic.

Sadly, the reporting of the General Synod vote on the amendment to the Canon on Marriage will be similar. The vote may be close but the numbers cast at the 2016 meeting indicate it will gain the required two thirds majority. This will cause further separation in the Anglican Communion, with the SEC left standing in the hallway as the naughty step is already occupied.

Would it not be nice if, as Jenny Marra observed at Diocesan Synod, the Church conducted its business with talk of reconciliation and not banishment? Would it not be nice if the Church provided political parties and governments with a model of how to be reconciled, as opposed to copying their behaviour? The move towards a more inclusive nation and more inclusive church may paradoxically cause us to drift apart and ultimately separate; the opportunity for reconciliation may be lost. I may be wrong in my analysis and conclusions, but Friday June 9th will be a long day.

Let's each praise God for his reconciliation and for coffee cups.
